Indeed, the hill was almost in accessible to the storming party, and any hesitation would have lost the day. The enemy's guns, so far as the correspondent could see, were all abandoned for the Boers had no time to remove them. A stream of fugitives poured down the hilside into the valley, where the battle went on with no abatement.

General Symons was wounded early in the action and the command then devolved on Major Yule. The cherry, as they field, were followed by the cavairy, mounted infanitry and artillery. The direction taken was to the eastward. At the latest reports the cavairy had not returned.

termon. The British losses are very severe, but those of the Boers are much beavier.

The final rush was made with a triumphant yell, and as the British troops charged to close quarters the enemy furned and fied, leaving all their impedimenta and guns behind them in their precipitate flight.

While this was going on one battery of artillery, the Eighteenth Hussars, and the mounted infantry, with a part of the Leicestershire regiment, got on the enemy of artillery, the Eighteenth Hussars, and the mounted infantry with a part of the Leicestershire regiment, got on the enemy's flank, and as the Boers atteamed wildly down the bills, making for the main road, they found their retreat had been cut off, but they railled for a will and there was severe firing, with considerable loss to each side. Many of the enemy surrendered. A rough extinate places the British loss at 250 killed or wounded, and that of the Boers at 800.

A newspaper correspondent states that through his glasses during the fighting lossy he noticed how much the oBers seemed to be nonplussed by the tactics of the imperial troops, especially of the well drilled, swift moving horsemen. The enemy are still, as of old, a mob. They are without horses and forage and many of them rely for food upon what they can obtain by losting. Their animals are mostly in a wretched condition.

It is understood that before today's battle soveral Boers had left their commandoes and gone home to their farms, and many others are now likely to follow.
